

Frankenwriting

Now that you've completed the team research and presented your conclusions, you are to take one main point from the body (analysis, not introduction) and fully develop it, using textual evidence from the primary source and weaving in support from two to three different secondary sources. Your goal is to present a written snapshot of your ability to synthesize sources to create a unified, coherent, and fully developed point from your thesis.

Requirements:

- Fully develop your chosen analysis point; break down into subpoints and list the supporting details you will use. (Will be more than one paragraph!).
- Use at least three pieces of supporting textual evidence from the primary source.
- Use supporting details from at least two to three secondary sources.
- Weave them together into a strong, supportive tapestry where your writing provides the foundational threads that hold everything together. To use another analogy, your words are the cookie dough that binds all the ingredients together into a well-balanced cookie. Be careful to spread the chips and nuts out—don't clump them all together!
- Use MLA format to document internally everything you borrow from a source, whether you quote directly, paraphrase, or summarize.
- Include a separate page for your list of Works Cited. Follow all MLA formatting requirements.
- Use the "literary present" tense.
- Use power verbs. NO expletives or passive voice! (5 pts. off score for each occurrence!)

Thesis Statement: (Write your team's thesis statement.)

Begin the body paragraph with a topic sentence that presents the main point you are developing.

Develop this main point and all its subpoints fully, using the primary and secondary sources!
